Towards Independence in
The Early Years

"Working together to help young children grow in confidence."

One way that we can all work together to help children grow in confidence is to support them in becoming more independent.

This will have a very positive effect upon their personal, social and learning skills.

Our experience tells us that if children are helped to develop the range of skills detailed opposite, they are happier and more confident both in school and at home.

Please start by doing some honest assessment of your child against the set of skills. There is no need to be anxious if there are things they cannot do; all children develop at different rates and having all the skills under the belt by this stage is not expected.

Next, talk to your child about what they need to work on to be more "grown up" and be able to do things on their own. Focus on one skill at a time. Then show them how to do it and encourage their efforts and praise their successes, no matter how small.

Children (and adults too) blossom with praise and become confident to tackle anything if they know that they can make mistakes without fear.

Use the chart on the back to let everyone in the family know what is happening so that they can help and encourage too. Or of course, you could be creative and make your own with your child.

Children can be helped towards independence by encouraging them to do these things on their own but we must be careful not to underestimate how difficult some of these skills might be some children. Talk to the Team Leader if you want some support; we are always willing to help.
